Human magnetism is a popular name for the supposed magnetic ability of people who to put various objects like spoons, knifes, to their chest, belly and shoulder. Yes, everyone can do it. You can see online many online Videos, Blogs publication, News articles and Discussion. Their skin has unique textural or adhesive properties, combined with a slight backward lean of the chest that create a high-friction grip. When scientists test these individuals with talcum powder or place objects on level skin, the items slide off, proving the metal adheres only to sticky or tilted surfaces.

Miroslaw Magola, also known as "Magnetic Man," does not place spoons or knives on his chest, stomach, or shoulder. He demonstrates something different ability which science does not yet known it and the scientists have not theory to explain it. Magola places pots, bowls, and plastic objects on the floor, then places his hand an object and lifts it vertically, allowing every eyewitness to see that gravity is not acting upon it. While holding these objects in a vertical position, he waves his hand in various directions, yet the objects do not fall.

Magola underwent numerous scientific tests and demonstrated his abilities on many international television programs. If you search Google for information who is Miroslaw Magola aka Magnetic Man, you will find claims that he is a Polish magician, which is not true.

Magola challenged the sceptics and non-believers—who supposedly offer a one-million-dollar prize—to a TV live show in USA where he would demonstrate his ability to lift objects off the floor while wearing a rubber glove to rule out a vacuum effect. To date, no individual or organization has responded to the Magnetic Man TV show Challenge. A great deal of false information about Magola is circulating online, intended to convince the average internet user that Miroslaw Magola alias Magnetic Man is a fake or a magician.
